PREFACE.

MANY of those who cultivate literature will acknowledge, that their exertions are oftener the result of accident, or of precipitate resolution, than of long cherished design, or mature reflection;—that their most laborious enterprises are, sometimes, undertaken without due regard to the difficulties which stand in the way of their completion; and that although the possibility or likelihood of ultimate success be at intervals contemplated, the ardour of the pursuit is kept up by causes independent of such considerations.

Firmness of purpose is peculiarly requisite in the Lexicographer who has had no precursor in his particular walk of compilation; who has had to encounter, at every step, the ruggedness and perplexities of an untrodden path; to contend with difficulties at every turn; to find barrenness where he hoped for fertility, obscurity where he looked for light, and misapprehension and error, where he expected certainty and truth. His difficulties are, without question, of a disheartening character: this I may be allowed to say from my own experience; yet I should be unwilling to utter an expression of dissatisfaction or regret: for I might be told that my labour was voluntary; that he who throws himself into trouble has nothing to blame but his own rashness; and that he who challenges difficulties or misfortune, deserves only ridicule for his complaints.

In undertaking the present task, I did not, perhaps, sufficiently consider the disadvantages under which I laboured, nor the odds against which I had to contend; but I knew that formidable obstacles have often yielded to steady resolution, and unremitting diligence.

It is not easy, in speaking of one's own labours, to avoid the imputation of egotism; I shall, therefore, leave it to others to form their own estimate of the present publication. I can only say that, though my task has been severe, it has not been without advantage; and that though it should never be crowned with great public approbation, it has not been altogether without its reward. It has pointed my way to various sources of learning which otherwise I should not have approached; it has led me to consult authors whom otherwise I should not have known; it has procured for me patronage which cannot be exalted by my praise, and friendship which I shall ever be proud to cherish.

The first remark which may occur in opening these sheets is, that I have been too lavish of quotations in some instances, and too sparing in others. On this subject I shall only observe, that I considered myself as engaged in the double task of instructing the ignorant, and of assisting the well-informed; that a Lexicographer ought not to take for granted the knowledge of those who consult him; and that I had, moreover, the design of throwing every facility in the way of future compilers. To the charge of being too sparing, I have to answer, that the list of authors in our language is so small, that, for a vast variety of words, I could not find, nor does there, I believe, exist, any written authority.

In the Gaelic-English Dictionary, the different acceptations of the Gaelic words might have been arranged with the same precision, and after the same method, as in some other dictionaries, but that the size and price of the work would be thereby nearly doubled.

In translating the Gaelic language, the inflections of nouns and verbs are apt to embarrass the young student. On that account I deemed it expedient, in a great variety of instances, to insert, as separate articles, the nominatives and datives plural of nouns, and such tenses of the verbs as are in most frequent use, and, at the same time, bear the least resemblance to the root; such are the præterite active, the future affirmative active and passive, and the past participle. I have also arranged many of the aspirate forms of words, as separate articles, and have referred for explanation to the simple form. This will, it is hoped, be found useful. Few students would conjecture that they must turn up chuas for chiasaibh; tigh for thigh; òl for dh'òl; dìrich for dhìrich; buail for buailidh; beir for rug; cluinn for chual; thoir, or thabhair, for bheirinn. If, in this, I should be considered diffuse by those who already know the language, I feel assured that I shall have the acknowledgment of those who know it not, and are desirous to acquire it.

It will be seen that, in many words, especially in those which I considered primitive, I have traced affinities to a considerable extent. In doing so, my object was to leave grounds for inferring the common origin of all languages, and to establish the antiquity of the Celtic. For, if nations far remote and unconnected, dissimilar in manners and customs, shall have preserved the same terms for all such objects as are most familiar to the observation of a people in a state of nature, the obvious inference is, that these terms must have been derived from a common origin;—from the language of the earliest inhabitants of the earth. Again, if the Celtic should be found to contain all such terms as are common to all languages, it is evident that it must have derived them from man's primeval tongue.

It is true that almost every language of antiquity has asserted its title to be considered the most ancient; and men whose cruidition cannot be disputed, have supported their respective claims. Of these, the Celtic has found an able advocate in Pezron, and other philologists; the Hebrew, in Leibnitz; the Phœnician, in Bochart; and the Dutch, in Gor. Bécanus.

The diversity of opinions entertained on this subject, may, perhaps, be accounted for. All the languages of antiquity, which are, in truth, but so many dialects of the primeval speech, have nearly an equal number of primitives; and each of them, therefore, in as far as roots are concerned, seems to carry, on the face of it, an argument for the earliest existence. There is little wonder, then, if a scholar should decide in favour of that with which he is most familiar, and that a great question in philology should be affected by that prejudice which intrudes itself into every department of human inquiry.

With all my admiration of the Celtic, I cannot join with those who ascribe to it an antiquity beyond that of many other languages; for I have not been able to discover, that it can be said, with truth, of any language, that it is the most ancient.

I do not propose to meddle, in this place, with the keenly contested point, whether the Gaelic of the Highlands be the parent of the speech of Ireland. However, I may be permitted to observe, that the Scotch Gaelic bears a closer resemblance to the parent Celtic, and has fewer inflections than the Welsh, Manks, or Irish dialects. It has this circumstance; too, in common with the Hebrew, and other oriental languages, that it wants the simple present tense; a peculiarity which strongly supports the opinion, that the Gaelic of Scotland is the more ancient dialect. This question has been long discussed with eagerness and ability. The one party draws its opinions partly from history, partly from acute hypothetical reasoning, and from the natural westward progress of early migration; the other argues from legends for which credulity itself is at a loss to discover a foundation.

Throughout this work, I have followed the orthography of two writers, who are relied on as guides by their countrymen;—the one, Dr. Stewart of Luss, the translator of the Holy Scriptures into Gaelic; the other, Dr. Smith of Campbelton, the author of a Gaelic metrical version of the Psalms, and other creditable works. These writers spent much of their time in settling the orthography of our language; and, as they have a just and acknowledged claim to be considered authorities, it is much to be desired that they should, henceforth, be regarded in that light. Fluctuations in the Gaelic language are perilous at this stage of its existence; for, if it be not transmitted to posterity in a regular, settled form, it is to be feared, that it must soon share the fate of the forgotten Cornish.

The rule caol ri caol agus leathan ri leathan, has been carefully observed by the writers already mentioned, especially by Dr. Stewart. It directs that two vowels, contributing to form two different syllables, should be both of the same class or denomination of vowels,—either both broad, or both small. Agreeably to this rule, we ought to write deanaibh, not deanibh; fòidean, not fòidan; bioran, not biran; and so on, with other words. This mode of spelling is a modern invention. It was first introduced by the Irish; and adopted by the Gael, with, I confess, more precipitation than propriety. It has its advantages and its disadvantages. It mars the primitive simplicity and purity of the language; but it removes from it that appearance of harshness which arises from too great a proportion of consonants. It not unfrequently; darkens somewhat the ground on which we trace the affinities of Gaelic words with those of the sister dialects, and of other languages; yet it has infused into our speech a variety of liquid and mellow sounds which were unknown, or at least not so perceptible before. It may be asked, why I have adhered to a rule of which I did not altogether approve? I reply, that any attempt at innovation—even at restoring the language to its primitive purity, might introduce more inconveniencies and evils than can result from the present settled system of orthography.

I have bestowed pains on referring derivative words to their primitives—in resolving compound words to their component parts—in affixing to substantives their genitive singular and gender—and to verbs their signification, whether active or neuter. The quotations from Gaelic writers are translated into English as literally as the idioms of these languages will allow.

The edition of Stewart's Gaelic Bible, of which I made use, was that printed at Edinburgh in 1807, for the Society in Scotland for Propagating Christian Knowledge. The particular book of the sacred volumes from which I take a quotation is almost always mentioned. Occasionally, however, O. T. or N. T. will be met with, where I could not remember the precise part of the Old or New Testament which contained my authority. G. B. occur where I could not remember nor ascertain from which of the Testaments the quotation was taken. These abbreviations are, I believe, of rare occurrence; and I have here adverted to them, in order to explain what, otherwise, might appear a want of precision.

The Gaelic, like all the languages of early times, does not abound in terms of science or art. It will be seen, therefore, in the English-Gaelic Dictionary, that terms in mathematics, metaphysics, and other sciences, I have been compelled to express by ambiology, and often by definition.

If it be found that, of names of instruments, as in agriculture and mechanics, some are rendered, perhaps, imperfectly, and others overlooked, let it be remembered, that no compilation ever yet recorded every vocable which floated in a spoken language; and that I could not, when an uncertainty occurred, transport myself to the proper sources of information, to make up for the scarcity of books and the defects of memory.

The Gaelic vocabularies of Shaw, Macfarlane, and Macdonald, and the Irish dictionaries of O'Brien and O'Reilly, were of considerable service to me. The mere collecting of words, however, was but a small part of my labour, compared with the wearisome and almost endless pursuit of authorities for different acceptations of the same word.

In tracing affinities, I derived great benefit from the works of Suidas, Cambry, Court de Gebelin, Menage, Rostrenen, Bullet, Pezron, Spellman, Lye, and Edward Lhuyd, among philologists; and, in matters of antiquity, from Strabo, Diodorus Siculus, Solinus, Tacitus, Ammianus, Usher, Toland, Huddleston, Keating, Malcolm, Dr. John Macpherson, Pennant, Smith, and a forgotten multitude of other erudite and ingenious writers.

In the English-Gaelic Dictionary, I have followed the orthography and arrangement of Perry.

It was once my design to prefix to this work a dissertation on the mechanism and philosophy of the Gaelic language; but, on reflection, I substituted a compendious view of its structure, as being more suitable to such a performance, and more likely to be of service. In this department of my compilation, I am indebted to the works of Shaw, O'Reilly, and O'Connor.

A circumstance not unworthy of notice concerning this Dictionary is, that a great part of it was printed while it was generally thought to be only in preparation. Hence it happened that, during the progress of these sheets through the press, I was, not unfrequently, favoured with communications from most respectable quarters, conveying encouragement which excited my gratitude, and offers of assistance which were, I lament, too late to be rendered available. No doubt, it would have been useful to my work, if I had obligations, on this account, to acknowledge. Be that as it may, I consider it due to myself to state, that neither in compiling this Dictionary, nor even in transcribing the mass of manuscript for publication, nor in superintending the press, have I received the least assistance whatever. For patronage, however, I am deeply beholden to several whom my commendations cannot affect, but whom gratitude compels me to mention.

The early and effective patron of this work, I am proud to make known, was Lord Strathavon; a young nobleman who, to many other acquirements, has added a most accurate knowledge of the Gaelic language. I have not vanity enough to attribute to the humble merits of my performance his Lordship's powerful support, to which I owe almost all the more splendid names on my list of subscribers; but rather to that liberal and active spirit with which he lends his aid to every cause which concerns the literature of the Scottish Gael, and the honour of their country.

To his Grace the Duke of Hamilton I feel greatly indebted for attention and encouragement; as also to Lord Archibald Hamilton, and to Lord Glenorchy,

Sir Charles Forbes, Bart., of Edinglassie, whose patriotic character is well known, laid me under early and great obligations. I value the kindness of this gentleman the more, because it procured for me the acquaintance of General Gordon of Balbithan, a very superior Celtic scholar and philologist, from whose conversation and suggestions I derived essential benefit.

I am gratified to rank, among my most zealous patrons, Dr. Mackinnon of Adelphi, and the Rev. Dr. Ross of Lochbroom; gentlemen whose knowledge of every branch of the Celtic language is the least of their acquirements.

Mr. Simon Mac Gillivray of Suffolk Lane has done this Dictionary a service, which I can never forget nor sufficiently acknowledge.

Mr. Robert Kennedy of Grenada will, I hope, accept of this expression of my gratitude for his most active support, to which I owe a great proportion of my West India subscribers.

My sense of the friendly and successful efforts of the late Dr. Charles Kennedy of St. Vincent, my schoolfellow and college companion, is equalled only by my regret for his untimely death, and my respect for his memory.

I have also my thanks to offer to the following gentlemen, who, though mentioned the last in order, are not the least in my esteem:—Capt. Duncan Mac Dougall of the 79th Regt. of Foot; the Rev. Daniel Mac Naughton of Glenco and Appin; the Rev. Alexander Anderson of Strontian; and the Rev. Alexander Kennedy of Mull.

It would be most ungrateful in me not to take this opportunity of mentioning, that, notwithstanding all the pátronage with which I have been favoured, it is questionable whether I could ever have offered these sheets to the public, but for the disinterested spirit of my publisher, Mr. Duncan.

To my Subscribers, in general, I return my sincerest acknowledgments. They may be assured that very strenuous exertions have been made to fulfil the promises held out in the Prospectus; and I trust that I shall be considered as having redeemed my pledge.

To hope that this Dictionary is free from imperfections, even after all the pains I have bestowed on it, would be presumptuous; and to expect that any circumstance shall cause those to be overlooked or forgiven, would be to hope for a favour which has been withheld from far higher claims and deserts than mine;—for the merits of one's cause are not always a protection from hostility and censure; and diligence, however laborious and sincere, is not always requited with approbation.

I forbear to mention the time which this work has occupied, and the labour which it has required. I might be discredited by some, and considered by others as indulging my vanity;—especially when I should add, that I had in the meanwhile to provide for my own subsistence; and that the compilation which I now send forth to the world, is, in truth, the production of such hours as I could spare from harassing occupations, or snatch from the proper seasons of repose.

Having stated this much, I must guard against misconstruction. I have no desire to conciliate hostility, nor to soften criticism. My cause is good. I have, under all disadvantages, done it the best service in my power; and I now, without presumption, yet without undue anxiety, submit my work to a public intelligent enough to know the value of every man's labour, and sufficiently generous to assign to all the degree of honour which they may deserve.

A GRAMMAR

OF THE

G A E L I C L A N G U A G E .

GRAMMAR, or the art of speaking and writing a language according to certain established rules, is divided into four parts, viz. Orthography, Etymology, Syntax, and Prosody.

ORTHOGRAPHY, or right spelling, teaches the true arrangement of letters in words; the correct utterance of which is called ORTHOEPY.

ETYMOLOGY teaches how to derive a word from its root or primitive, — the parts of speech, — the inflection of nouns and verbs, — and the modifications by which the sense of a word is diversified.

SYNTAX teaches how to arrange words into sentences.

PROSODY teaches the accent and quantity of syllables, and the measure of verse.

OF ORTHOGRAPHY, OR RIGHT SPELLING.

The old Gaelic, commonly called the Irish, alphabet, consists of eighteen letters, which are divided into vowels and consonants.

THE ALPHABET.

Roman Characters.	Old Gaelic, or Irish.	Ancient Gaelic Name.	Translation.
A a	Ḃ ḃ	Ailm.	Elm.
B b	B b	Beithe.	Birch.
C c	C c	Coll.	Hazel.

E e	E e	Eagh.	Aspen.
F f	F f	Fearn.	Alder.
G g	G g	Goibh, or gath.	A spear.

OF VOWELS, AND VOWEL SOUNDS.

Of these, a, e, i, o, u, are vowels, which Irish grammarians have divided into broad and small: a, o, u, are broad; e, i, small.

A.

A represents three different sounds; in the first two of which it is both long and short. A long, sounds like the English a in bar, or the Italian a in amo; as, àl, broad; sàr, excellent: and short, like a in cat, as, cas, a foot; falt, hair.

A, immediately preceding dh and gh, has a long and a short diphthongal sound, to which there is none correspondent in English. In this situation it much resembles the sound of the French diphthong eu; long, as, ladhar, a hoof; agh-mhor, fortunate: short, as a in lagh, law; tagh, choose.

A sounds short and obtuse, like e in open, in the three forms of the article a, an, am, and in the plural terminations a and an; as, laghanna, laws; beanntan, mountains.

E.

E represents three different sounds.

E, with the grave accent (è), sounds long, like the Greek η , as pronounced in Scotland and on the Continent, or like e in where; as, è, he; rè, during the time of: and short, like e in wet; as, teth, hot; in which state it is never accented.

E, with the acute accent (é), sounds like the Greek η , as, pronounced in England; as, té, a female.

E final has an obtuse sound, like e in open; as, beannuichte, blessed; buailte, struck;—there being no silent final vowels in Gaelic.

I.

I sounds like ee in English, but sometimes long and sometimes short; long, as, sin, stretch; sìth, peace: short, like ee in feet; as, bith, existence.

O.

O represents three different sounds, in each of which it is both long and short.

O long, sounds sometimes like o in lord; as, òl, drink; ròmach, hairy: and sometimes like o in fold; as, còt, a coat; tom, a hillock.

O short, sounds sometimes like o in pot; as, brod, a lid; grod, rotten; borb, fierce: and sometimes like o in rope; as, slob, a puddle.

O, before gh, has a long and a short diphthongal sound: long, as, sogh, luxury; short, as, roghuinn, choice.

U.

U sounds like u in French and Italian, or like the English oo in moon, but sometimes long and sometimes short: long, as, fudar, powder; short, as, fulan, a welcome.

OF THE DIPHTHONGS.

A diphthong is the meeting of two vowels in one syllable. In Gaelic there are thirteen diphthongs, and they are derived from the vowels in the following manner:

From a $\begin{cases} ae. \\ ai. \\ ao. \end{cases}$ From e $\begin{cases} ea. \\ ei. \\ eo. \\ eu. \end{cases}$ From i $\begin{cases} ia. \\ io. \\ iu. \end{cases}$ From o, oi. From u $\begin{cases} ua. \\ ui. \end{cases}$

Of these, ao, eu, are improper diphthongs; the rest are proper.

PROPER DIPHTHONGS.

Ae.

Ae occurs but in a few words; as, Gael,* a Highlander.

Ai.

Ai sounds like ai in the French canaille; as, caill, lose; saill, salt; pailteas, plenty. Very frequently i is but faintly sounded; as in àite, a place; fàilte, welcome.

Ea.

Ea sounds like ea in the English noun bear; as, each, a horse; feur, a man; but before a palatal, c, g; or a lingual, l, n, r; or a dental, d, s, t, not silent, the prepositive is often either quiescent, or but faintly sounded; as, cealg, deceit; geall, a wager.

Ei.

Ei sometimes gives the sound of both vowels; as, feidh, deer; and sometimes that of e alone; as, réidh, a plain. Before the palatals, c, g, the linguals, l, n, r, or the dentals, d, s, t, not silent, i is but faintly heard; as, reic, sell; leig, let; féin, self: and often confers on a following palatal, a double palatal sound; as, thig, (pronounce heek), shall come; and on a dental, a double dental sound; as, theid, shall go (pron. héich, articulating ch as in church).

Eo.

Eo sounds somewhat like aw in yawl; as, ceòl, music; ceò, mist.

Ia.

Ia has both vowels heard; as, fiar, crooked; iall, a thong; ciar, dusky; but in cia? what? and iad, they, ia often sounds like e in where.

* Gael and Gaelach are more commonly written Gaidheal and Gaidhealach, to preserve the rule, caol ri caol, is leathan ri leathan.

Io.

Io sounds both long and short: long, as, ea in fear; as, sior, ever; fior, true: and short, not unlike the French eu; as, fiodh, timber. Before a palatal, lingual, or dental, o is not always, or but faintly, heard; as, pioc, pick; ciod, what; sgiol, skill; bior, a thorn; fios, knowledge.

Iu.

Iu sounds both its vowels; as, fiù, (pron. few), worthy; except before c, g, or d, l, n, r, s, t, where it is not sounded; as, tiugh, thick, (pron. chiù); diùlt, deny, (pron. chiùlt).

Oi.

Oi sounds both its vowels: long, as, doigh, manner; sloigh, host: short, as, troidh, a foot; bloidh, a piece. Except before c, g, l, n, r, s, t, not silent, i is quiescent, and affects the sound of the consonant which it precedes; as, toic, substance, (pron. toix); foid, a turf, (pron. fòch, ch sounding as in chair); coise, gen. of cas, foot, (pron. coish).

Ua.

Ua sounds both its vowels; as, tuar, colour; fuar, cold. Except before ch, dh, gh, th, the a of ua commonly sounds like e in her; as, bruach, a bank; tuadh, a hatchet; sluagh, people; luath, swift.

Ui.

Ui sounds both its vowels; as, buidhinn, gain; luidh, lie. Except before c, g, l, n, r, s, t, the i of ui is not heard; but it affects the sound of the consonant following, as, luis, (pron. luish); tuit, fall, (pron. tuich, ch as in church); sluig, swallow, (pron. slluk,—k as in key).

IMPROPER DIPHTHONGS.

Ao.

Ao has a peculiar sound, not attainable by the ear, much resembling that of eu in the French heure; as, laogh, a calf; and a nasal sound, as, muoth, soft.

Eu.*

Eu sounds like ei in feign; beum, a blow; feum, need.

OF THE TRIPHTHONGS.

The triphthongs are these five: aoi, eo, iai, iu, uai. They are pronounced respectively, like the diphthongs, ao, eo, ia, iu, ua, with the addition of a short i, which serves to liquefy the sound of the following consonant. They are all long, and never occur but in monosyllables, or in the first syllable of polysyllables.

OF THE CONSONANTS.

There are twelve consonants, b, c, d, f, g, l, m, n, p, r, s, t; h is rather a mark of aspiration than a radical letter.

The consonants in Gaelic may be conveniently brought into the following arrangement: Labials, Palatals, Dentals, and Linguals.

Labials	}	b. f. m. p.	Palatals	}	c. g.	Dentals	}	d. t. s.	Linguals	}	l. n. r.
---------	---	--	----------	---	------------------------	---------	---	-------------------------------------	----------	---	-------------------------------------

Of these, b, c, d, f, g, m, p, s, t, are mutable, or capable of aspiration, by having h subjoined; in which state their simple sound is either altered or lost. The immutable are l, n, r.

Labials.

B.

B simple sounds somewhat harder than b, and softer than p, in English; as, buail, strike; bean, touch. Bh sound like v in English, French, and Italian; as, bhean, touched; bhac, hindered. Bh, at the end of a word or syllable, either sound like u, or stand for a gentle aspiration; as, searbh, bitter; fiabhras, a fever. Sometimes bh, in the middle of a word, are silent; as, soirbheas, prosperity; doirbheas, adversity.

F.

F simple is pronounced as in most other languages; fh are silent; as, fhad, long; an Fhraing, France. In a very few words, as, mì fhéin, myself, fh sound like h in English.

M.

M simple, the same as in English; as, mòr, great; caman, a club; lom, bare. Mh sound like v in English; as, amhàin, only; a mhusgaid, the musket. Frequently, though never at the beginning of a word, mh sound like a nasal oo, or stand for a gentle aspiration; as, ramh, an oar; and sometimes they are altogether quiescent, as, comhnard, level; dhomh, to me.

* In the West and Northern Highlands, this diphthong is often pronounced like ia; as, miad, size, for meud; ian, bird, for eun.

P.

P simple sounds as in English and other languages; as, pronn, bruise; peasg, a gash; ph like f in English, as, phronn, bruised.

Palatals.

C.

C simple has two sounds: (1.) Like c in cub; as, cù, a dog; crath, shake. (2.) When preceded in the same syllable by a small vowel, it has, in most parts of the Highlands, a sound to which that of χ is pretty similar; as, airc, distress, (pron. $\alpha i \epsilon \chi \alpha$). In some parts it sounds like k.

Ch sound like the Gr. χ in $\chi \alpha \rho \delta \eta$, or like the Irish gh in lough, or the vulgar Scotch ch in loch, as, moch, early; and, when followed by a small vowel, like χ in $\chi \epsilon \mu \alpha \nu$; as, chì, shall see.

G.

G simple sounds, at the beginning of a word, nearly as in English; at the end of a word, its sound more nearly resembles that of the English k in rock; as, rug, bore; thug, gave.

G aspirated, or gh, followed by a, o, or u, sounds somewhat softer than the Greek χ ; as, ghàir, laughed; excepting at the end of a syllable, and then it is silent; as, tigh, a house; rioghachd, a kingdom.

Gh, followed by e or i, sounds like y in ye; as, ghios, (pron. yeess), towards.

Dentals.

D.

D simple is more a dental than in English, and sounds somewhat like the French and Italian d; as, dàn, a song; duine, a man; dlagh, a handful; madadh, a mastiff; rud, a thing. Except when it is followed by e or i, or is preceded in the same syllable by i; for then it sounds like ch in child; as, clogaid, a helmet; càirdeas, friendship.

D, preceded by dh, sounds like χ ; as, lochd, harm, (pron. $llo\chi\alpha$).

Dh, at the beginning of a word, has a somewhat softer sound than the Greek χ ; as, dha, to him; but if followed by e or i, it sounds like y in English; as, dhetth, of him; dh' i, of her, (pron. yeä, yě).

Dh, at the end, or in the middle of a word, is most frequently quiescent; as, chaidh, went; fàidheadaireachd, prophecy.

T.

T simple, immediately followed by a, o, or u, or a consonant, sounds like the French t in tems, or the Italian t in tempo; as, tamh, rest; taom, pour; tlà, smooth.

T simple, preceded in the syllable by u, or immediately followed by e or i, sounds like ch in child; as, tein, fire, (pron. chein); fàilte, welcome, (pron. failch, ch sounding as in church).

T aspirated, or th, like h in home; as, thoir, give; but in the middle, or at the end of a word, it is silent; as, fitheach, a raven; bith, existence.

S.

S simple, preceded or followed by a, e, or i, sounds like sh in English; as, sion, (pron. shion), a blast; gnuis, (pron. gnūish), a visage. Except is, (pron. iss), am.

S simple, preceded or followed by a, o, or u, sounds like s in English; as, sabh, a salve; sogh, luxury; mios, a mouth.

S simple, followed by d, t, l, or n, and a short vowel, sounds like sh in English; as, sdiùir, or stiùir, steer; slios, a side; sniomh, spin.

S, before any other consonant, even though followed by a short vowel, sounds like s in English; as, smig, (pron. smik), a chin; sméid, (pron. smēich), a nod.

S aspirated, or sh, is silent; as, shèdl, directed, (pron. heōl); excepting when followed by l or n, and then there is no aspiration; as, shnàmh, (pron. nāv), swam; shlànuich, (pron. lānιχ), healed.

Linguals.

The lingual consonants, as has been said, are incapable of aspiration; but they have often a double lingual sound, to which there is none similar in English.

L.

L simple, like l in large; as, las, flamed. It has this sound when it begins the preterites of verbs and the feminine form of adjectives.

L has its double lingual sound when followed by e or i, and then it is articulated like ll in million, or like the Italian gl, or the Portuguese lh; as, linn, an age; lèin, a shirt. Yet, with regard to nouns beginning with l, if the masc. poss. pron. goes before, l sounds as in English; as, a litir, his letter; where l differs materially in sound from l in a litir, her letter.

L has another double lingual sound, generally, when it is preceded by itself, or when it is followed by a, o, or u, in verbs and in adjectives masculine; as, fallain, healthy; làn, full; lom, bare; lus, an herb.

ll, preceded or followed by a short vowel, also sounds as the Italian gl.

ll, preceded or followed by a, o, or u, has the same double lingual sound as in làn, masculine, but has no sound similar to it in English.

N.

N simple sounds like n in English in the beginning of preterites, and whenever it is preceded by a, o, or u; as, nigh, washed; làn, full; lon, a thrush; rùn, affection; and in the middle of words, as, sìnidh, shall stretch.

N has its double sound in the beginning of a verb in the imperative mood, and followed by a, o, or u; as, nochd, shew; or at the beginning of a masculine adjective, and followed by a broad vowel; as, naomh, holy; nuadh, new. In this situation it has no similar sound in English, but is the same with the first n in the French non.

The same observations apply to the reduplicated nn.

N has another double sound, when immediately preceded by i, or when i is the last vowel of the same syllable; as, linn, an age; cùirn, cairns; uinneag, a window; and at the beginning of imperatives, and certain other tenses, when followed by a small vowel; as, nigh, wash. In this situation it sounds exactly like gn, in the French gùigne, or the Italian regno.

N, preceded by m or c, is in some words pronounced like r; as, cnaimh (craimh), a bone; cnò (crò), a nut.

Lastly, an and nan, when the next word begins with c or g, sound like ng and nung; as, an cù, the dog; an gial, the cheek; nan cealgair, of the deceivers.

R.

R simple sounds like r in English; as, rath, (pron. ra), luck; rìgh, a king. Rìgh, in the vocative, has no sound similar to it in English, but it is exactly that of ri in the French infériorité.

R, if preceded by i, or if followed by i, and forming a syllable, sounds as above, like ri in the French infériorité; as, rithe, with her; mairbh, dead; còir, right.

OF ETYMOLOGY.

ETYMOLOGY is that part of grammar which teaches how to derive a word from its primitive,—shews the parts of speech, the inflections of nouns, and the modifications by which the sense of a word is diversified.

OF THE PARTS OF SPEECH.

In Gaelic there are nine parts of speech, viz. Article, Noun, Pronoun, Verb, Participle, Adverb, Preposition, Interjection, Conjunction. These are divided into declinable and indeclinable.

The declinable parts of speech are,—the Article, Noun, Pronoun, Verb, Participle.

The indeclinable are,—the Adverb, Preposition, Interjection, Conjunction.

OF THE ARTICLE.

There is no indefinite article in Gaelic. An, the, is the definite article, and is declined by genders, cases, and numbers.

Singular.		Plural.
Mas.	Fem.	Mas. and Fem.
Nom. An, an.	An, a'.	Na.
Gen. An, a'.	Na.	Nan, nam.
Dat. An,* a'.	An, a'.	Na.

The form an of the article is used before a simple (not aspirated) labial; as, an buille, the blow; an fear, the man: before any aspirated consonant (except fh) the article is written a'.

A substantive noun, beginning with s, followed by a liquid or by a vowel, requires the insertion of t between it and the article, in the gen. and dat. sing. mas. of nouns, and in the nom. and dat. of feminine nouns.

A sub. mas. beginning with a vowel has t between it and the article in the nom. sing.

A sub. fem. has h in the same situation in the gen. sing.

Nouns which are either mas. or fem. have h in the nom. and dat. plural.

Nan, of the gen. pl., is always used, except before words beginning with b, f, p. Nan; before c or g, sounds nang:

OF GENDER.

The genders are two, masculine and feminine.

The Gaelic language is very anomalous in its distinction of nouns by gender; and perhaps no set of rules can be devised to ascertain the gender of every noun in the language. It personifies every object, whether animate or inanimate. The gender is not determined by termination, or any circumstance, but by immediate distinction of sex, and by custom.

Masculines.

Nouns signifying males, are masculine; as, duine, a man; luoch, a hero; cach, a horse.

NOTE.—That lèmhann, lion; laogh, calf; uan, lamb; and several other names for the young of animals, are masculine, though the objects be feminine.

Nouns in o, or having o in the last syllable, are commonly masculine; as, ceò, must; roth, a wheel; corp, a body.

Polysyllables in a, o, or u, are commonly masculine.

Diminutives in an are masculine; as, caman, a club; fuaran, a well; barran, a thorn-fence.

* An, after a vowel, is written 'n.

Derivatives in ach, iche, as, air, ear, are for the most part masculine; as, marcuch, a rider; maraiche, a seaman; piobair, a piper; muillear, a miller; càirdeas, friendship.

Names of trees are commonly masculine.

Feminines.

Nouns signifying females are feminine; as, màthair, a mother.

Aggregate names of trees are feminine; as, darach, oak-wood.

Names of countries, especially those ending in achd, or which have a short vowel in the last syllable; as, Gaidhealtachd, the Highlands; Eirin, Ireland. The names of districts have their gender commonly regulated by their termination.

Names of musical instruments; as, piob, a pipe; cruit, a harp.

Names of diseases; as, buinneach, a diarrhœa.

Polysyllables (except agents in air and iche) whose least vowel is e, or i, are commonly feminine; as, neasgaid, a boil; doirlinn, an isthmus.

Diminutives in ag; as, sradag, a spark.

Derivatives in achd; as, maiseachd, comeliness; rioghachd, a kingdom.

Comparatives used substantively, are feminine; as, maoile, baldness; gile, whiteness.

Nouns in ua, and ui, a diphthong, the subjunctive of which is a slender or small vowel, are commonly feminine; as, cuach, a cup; compaillt, company.

OF NUMBER.

A noun has two numbers, singular and plural.

The cases are four, viz. Nominative, Genitive, Dative, Vocative.

A noun is either simple or aspirated, e. g. mòr, mhòr, where mòr is the simple form, and mhòr the aspirated.

Nouns in a definite sense are declined with the article.

The flexion of a Gaelic noun is carried on not so much by a change of the termination, as of the last vowel, or of the diphthong of the nominative, and by aspirating the initial consonant.

The Gael have only two declensions. Nouns whose last vowel is a, o, or u, are of the first; nouns whose last vowel is e, or i, are of the second.

OF ADJECTIVES.

An adjective is a word which denotes some quality belonging to the substantive; as, duine math, a good man; tigh mòr, a large house.

In Gaelic, the adjective is varied on account of gender, number, and case.

The changes which an adjective undergoes in the course of flexion are twofold: first, by aspirating the initial consonant; and, secondly, by changing the termination.

Adjectives, like substantives, are either of the first or second declension.

Adjectives which are characterized by a, o, or u, are of the first declension.

Adjectives characterized by i, are of the second.

ADJECTIVES OF THE FIRST DECLENSION.

Marbh, dead.

SINGULAR.		PLURAL.
Masc.	Fem.	Masc. and Fem.
Nom. Marbh,	Mharbh,	Marbha.
Gen. Mhairbh,	Mairbhe,	Marbha.
Dat. Marbh,	Mhairbh,	Marbha.
Voc. Mhairbh.	Mharbh,	Marbha.

RULES FOR THE INFLECTION OF ADJECTIVES OF THE FIRST DECLENSION.

SINGULAR NUMBER.

NOMINATIVE.

The initial consonant, when it admits of aspiration, is aspirated for the feminine gender, and terminates like the masculine; as, mòr, m. mhòr, fem. great; fann, m. fhann, fem. weak; ceart, m. cheart, fem. right.

OBLIQUE CASES.

The oblique cases of each gender are formed like those nouns of the first declension, and follow the same rules.

GENITIVE.

In general, the genitive singular feminine is formed from the genitive singular masculine by throwing aside the aspirate of the initial consonant; and monosyllables, after this change, commonly add e.

If the noun masculine ends in e, that vowel is retained throughout.

The learner may derive some help from the following table:—

Nom. sing. mas.	Nom. sing. fem.	Gen. sing. mas.	Gen. sing. fem.

Throm, heavy ,	Thruim,	Thruim,	Throm.
Truagh, wretched ,	Thruaigh,	Thruaigh,	Thruagh.

PLURAL NUMBER.

A monosyllabic adjective adds a to the nominative singular masculine; as, nom. sing. mas. mòr, great, pl. mòra.

Adjectives of more than one syllable have their plural cases like the nominative singular; as, nom. sing. brònach, sorrowful, pl. brònach; cinnteach, sure, pl. cinnteach.

ADJECTIVES OF THE SECOND DECLENSION.

These adjectives are characterized by i, and they form their cases like substantives of the second declension. Some adjectives of two syllables, of both declensions, are contracted in the plural; as, reamhara, contr. reamhra, fat; milise, contr. milse, sweet.

The initial form of the adjective depends, (1) on the gender of its noun, (2) on its termination, (3) on its sense being definite or indefinite.*

OF THE COMPARISON OF ADJECTIVES.

In Gaelic there are three degrees or states of comparison; the Positive, Comparative, and Superlative.

The Positive merely expresses the quality; as, tha 'n dath so dearg, this colour is red.

The Comparative enlarges or diminishes the quality; as, is e so dath is deirge, this is the redder colour.

The Superlative expresses the quality of an object in the highest degree; as, is e so an dath is deirge dhiubh uile, this is the reddest colour of them all.

* If a substantive feminine ends in n, and its adjective begins with d, there is no initial change in the adjective; as, cailinn dubh, ailinn donn.

OF THE FORMATION OF THE DEGREES OF COMPARISON.

The comparative of monosyllables is commonly like the genitive singular feminine, and is generally followed by na.*

Positive.	Gen. sing. fem.	Comp.	Positive.	Gen. sing. fem.	Comp.
Bàn, fair ,	Bàine,	Bàinc.	Donn, brown ,	Duinne,	Duinne.
Borb, fierce ,	Buirbe,	Buirbe.	Dubh, black ,	Duibhc,	Duibhe.
Buan, lasting ,	Buaine,	Buaine.	Fann, weak ,	Fainne,	Fainne.

Deas, ready ,	Deise,	Dcise.	Trom, heavy ,	Truime,	Truime.

If the positive end in ach or each, the comparative is formed by adding e to the genitive singular feminine; as,

Positive.	Gen. sing. fem.	Comp.	Positive.	Gen. sing. fem.	Comp.
Cealgach, deceitful ,	Cealgaich,	Cealgaiche.	Ciontach, guilty ,	Ciontaich,	Ciontaiche.
Cinnteach, sure ,	Cinntich,	Cinntiche.	Maiseach, handsome ,	Maisich,	Maisiche.

The following adjectives are contracted in the comparative; as,

Pos.	Comp.	Pos.	Comp.
Bodhar, deaf ,	Buidhe.	Bòidheach, pretty ,	Bòidheche.
Domhainn, deep ,	Doimhne.	Odhar, sallow ,	Uidhre.

If the positive be characterized by i, the comparative is formed by adding e; as,

Pos.	Comp.	Pos.	Comp.
Banaile, modest ,	Banaile.	Caoimhneil, kind ,	Caoimhneile.
Caomhail, kind ,	Caomhaile.	Làidir, strong ,	Làidire.

If the positive end in o or uidhe, the positive and comparative are alike; as, beo, lively, comp. beo; buidhe, yellow, comp. buidhe.

THE SUPERLATIVE DEGREE.

The superlative is like the comparative, and is followed by the preposition do or dhe, either simple, or compounded with a pronoun.

Ro, fior, and sàr, put before an adjective, answer respectively to the English very, truly, exceedingly. They always throw the adjective into the aspirated form; as, ro mhath, very good; fior mhath, truly good; sàr mhath, exceeding good.

Comparatives and superlatives undergo no change in the termination.

IRREGULAR COMPARISONS.

Pos.	Comp.	Sup.
Beag,	Lugha,	Lugha, little, less, least .
Cairdeach,	Càra, cairdiche,	Càra, cairdiche, akin, more akin, most akin .

Teth,	Teoithe,	Teoithe, hot, hotter, hottest .
Toigh,	Docha,	Docha, dear, dearer, dearest .

* There is a double comparative, having the nature of both a substantive and adjective: it is formed from the comparative by changing e into id; as, teoithe, hotter, teoitid. Every adjective does not admit of this form of comparison.

OF PRONOUNS.

A PRONOUN is a word put instead of a noun, to prevent the too frequent repetition thereof; as, tha Dia mòr; tha e sona; tha e gràsmhor; tha e naomh.

There are six kinds of pronouns; viz. the Personal, the Relative, the Adjective, the Interrogative, the Indefinite, and the Compound pronouns.

PERSONAL PRONOUNS.

There are four personal pronouns; they admit of Person, Gender, Number, and of a Simple and Emphatic form. A personal pronoun is thrown into an emphatic form by the addition of sa, or san, se, ne, to the simple form.

SIMPLE FORM.

Mi, mhi, I , the first person,	} Singular.	Sinn, we , the first person,	} Plural.
Tu,* thu, thou , the second person,		Sibh,† you , the second person,
E, se, he , } the third person,		Iad, siad, they , the third person,
I, si, she , }

EMPHATIC FORM.

Mise, mhise, I , the first person,	} Singular.	Sinne, we , the first person,	} Plural.
Tusa, thusa, thou , the second person,		Sibhse, you , the second person,
Esa, esan, he , } the third person,		Iadsa, iadsan, they , the third person,
Ise, — she , }

The forms of the personal pronoun governed by a transitive verb are,

Simple form.	Emph. form.	Simple form.	Emph. form.
Mi,	Mise, me ,	Sinn,	Sinne, us ,
Thu,	Thusa, thee ,	Sibh,	Sibhse, you ,
E,	Esan, him ,	Iad,	Iadsan, them ,
I,	Ise, her ,
	} Singular.		} Plural.

NOTE.—That fèin when added to a personal pronoun, is equivalent to the Latin syllabic adjection met, English self, or selves; mi fèin, or mi fhèin, myself; mise fèin, my own self.

Thu fèin, or thu fhèin, thyself; thusa fèin, thy own self.

E fèin, or e fhèin, himself; esan fèin, his own self.

I fèin, or i fhèin, herself; ise fèin, her own self.

Sinn fèin, or sinn fhèin, ourselves; sinne fèin, our own selves.

Sibh fèin, or sibh fhèin, yourselves; sibhse fèin, your own selves.

Iad fèin, or iad fhèin, themselves; iadsa fèin, themselves.

Gender has respect only to the third person singular of the pronouns, e, i. E is masculine, i is feminine. There is no neuter gender in Gaelic, as has been already observed.

RELATIVE PRONOUNS.

There are three relative pronouns, nom. a, who, which; gen. and dat. an; nach, who not, which not, that not; na, that which.

ADJECTIVE PRONOUNS.

The adjective pronouns may be subdivided into the Possessive, the Demonstrative, and the Distributive.

I. The Possessive Pronouns are,

Mo, my ,	} Singular.	Ar, our ,	} Plural.
Do, thy ,		Bhur, or ur, you ,
A, her ,		An, or am, their ,

These pronouns never have the emphatic syllable subjoined, like the personal pronouns; but when they agree with a substantive, the emphatic form is expressed as follows:

Simple form.	Emph. form.	Simple form.	Emph. form.
Mo cheann,	Mo cheann-sa,	Ar ceann,	Ar ceann-ne,
Do cheann,	Do cheann-sa,	Bhur, or ur ceann,	Bhur, or ur ceann-sa,
A cheann,	A cheann-san,	An ceann,	An ceann-san,
	} Singular.		} Plural.

* The personal pronoun tu, th, or thusa, is used in addressing our equals and our inferiors; and, what is remarkable, in our addresses to the Supreme Being.

† Sibh, or sibhse, is commonly used when we address our superiors in age or in rank; yet the second personal pronoun is beautifully applied to majesty, and to people of very high rank.

‡ Am is used before words beginning with a labial not aspirated; an is used before all other consonants, and before words beginning with a vowel.

If the substantive be followed by an adjective, the emphatic adjection is put after the adjective only; and if it be followed by more adjectives than one, the adjection is put after the last; as,

Do ghnùis bhòidheach-sa, thy pretty face.
Do lamh bhòidheach gheal-sa, thy pretty white hand.
Do phiuthair gaoil-sa, thy beloved sister.

Before a vowel or f aspirated, mo and do are written with an apostrophe; as, m'athair, my father; d'ainm, thy name.

11. The Demonstrative Pronouns are three, so, sin, sud or ud; so, this; sin, that; *sud or ud, you, yonder.

111. The Distributive Pronouns are, gach, each, every; gach uile, contracted chuile, or h-uile, every; a chèile, each other.

INTERROGATIVE PRONOUNS.

The interrogative pronouns are, co? who? cia? which? ciod? what? and nach, which is used when a question is put in a negative form.

INDEFINITE PRONOUNS.

The indefinite pronouns express their subjects in a general manner; the following are of this description:

Càch, the rest,	Cia b'e, whoever.
Cuid, some,	Cia b'e air bith, whoever.
Cuid eile, some others,	Co air bith, whoever.
Eigin, some,	Ciod air bith, whatever.
Eile, other.

COMPOUND PRONOUNS.

The personal pronouns in Gaelic are often found combined with prepositions, which generally govern different cases; and, in that state, they form a part of speech which may be termed Compound Pronouns. The prepositions which are capable of being thus united, are the following: aig or ag, at; air, on; ann, in; as, out of; de, off; do, to; eadar, between; fo, fodha, or fuidh, under; gu, till; le, with; mu, about; o or ua, from; ri, to; roimh, before; thar, over; troimh, through. The syllabic adjections, as has been said, throw the pronouns into the emphatic form.

OF THE VERB.

A VERB expresses action, being, or suffering.

In Gaelic there are two conjugations. The first comprehends all those verbs which begin with any consonant, except f; as, paig, wrap. Under the second are arranged those which begin with a vowel or with f; as, òb, refuse; fill, fold.

The Gaelic verb is declined by Voices, Moods, Tenses, Numbers, and Persons.

There are two Voices; Active and Passive.

The different particles of conjunction and adverb in Gaelic might give rise to a variety of moods, but they may be reduced into the five following:—The Affirmative, or Indicative, the Negative, or Interrogative, the Subjunctive, or Optative, the Imperative, and the Infinitive.

There are three times or tenses; the Present, Preterite, and Future.

There are two numbers; Singular and Plural.

There are three persons; First, Second, and Third.

Verbs, like nouns, are inflected by aspirating the initial consonant, and by an occasional change of termination.

* We also say, An t-aon fear 'ar fhichead, an dara fear 'ar fhichead, an treas fear 'ar fhichead, &c.

† We also say, An t-aon chlach 'ar fhichead, an dara clach 'ar fhichead, an treas clach 'ar fhichead, &c.

* Dean, do, or make, and rach, go, are often used as auxiliary verbs; as, dean luidhe, lie down; dean seasamh, stand; literally, make a lie down; make a stand; chaidh mo chreachadh, I was plundered, i. e. my plundering is gone or past; rachadh mo bhualadh, I would be struck, i. e. the striking of me would have passed or happened. These auxiliaries are declinable with all the conjunctive and adverbial particles.

† Am bheil is, almost always, pronounced 'm bheil or bheil; in some districts of the Highlands, as in Badenoch, they say am beil.

‡ 'Eil for bheil. After the conjunctive particles cha, nach, mur, bheil is written 'eil; and in order to separate the two vowels, and also to prevent an hiatus, we insert the letter n, and write cha 'n 'eil, rather than cha 'eil.

IMPERSONAL VERBS.

THE Preterite Affirmative of Neuter Verbs, and the Future of the Negative or Interrogative Mood of Active Verbs, are often used impersonally; as, ghuileadh, buailear, gluaisear, faicear, faighear. Any verb used in this way may be declined with the compound pronoun leam, through all its persons; yet it is not accounted so elegant to express the pronoun, as to leave it to be supplied according to the sense of the context. The impersonal verbs are used after this manner.

Sing.	}	leam, I	}	struck.

OF IRREGULAR VERBS.

THE Irregular Verbs are reckoned ten; seven of the first conjugation, viz. dean, cluinn, beir, rach, ruig, thig, thoir, or thabhair; and three of the second, viz. faic, faigh, abair.

SYNTAX, OR CONSTRUCTION.

SYNTAX is the right arrangement of the words of a language into sentences or phrases. Its parts are two, viz. Concord, and Government or Regimen.

OF CONCORD.

CONCORD is the agreement which one word has with another, in Gender, Number, Case, or Person.

RULE I.

The article is placed immediately before its substantive, and agrees with it in gender, number, and case; as,

Am bord.		The table.
A bhean.		The woman.
An fhoid.		The turf.
Na sluic.		The pits.

RULE II.

Sometimes an adjective comes between the article and its noun; as,

Is tu an droch leanabh,		Thou art a bad child.
Is e am fìor laoch,		He is a real hero.

RULE III.

An adjective agrees with its substantive in gender, number, and case; as,

Duine saibhir.		A rich man.
Bean ghasd.		A chaste wife.
Tighean mora.		Large houses.

RULE IV.

The possessive pronouns mo (my), do (thy), a (his), precede the substantive, and throw it into the aspirated form; as,

Mo dhorn.		My fist.
Do chas.		Thy foot.
A chladheamh.		His sword.

RULE V.

The substantive most commonly precedes its adjective; as,

Lann geur.		A sharp blade.
Duine glic.		A wise man.

RULE VI.

Some monosyllabic adjectives precede their substantives, and then the substantives assume the aspirated form; as,

Droch dhuine.		A bad man.
Og-bhean.		A young wife.
Garbh chuan.		A rough sea.

RULE VII.

If is be the verb of a sentence, the adjective comes before the noun; as,

Is domhainn do } chreuchd.—Oss. }		Deep is thy wound.
--------------------------------------	--	---------------------------

RULE VIII.

Two or more substantives in apposition, or signifying the same thing, ought to agree in case; as,

^a Oscar ^a mae ^b Oisein		Oscar the son of Ossian,
^b mhic ^b Fhionnghail		the son of Fingal, the
^m hic Chumhail.		son of Cumhal.

RULE IX.

Numerals precede their nouns; as,

Tri lathan.		Three days.
Seach fir.		Seven men.

Such instances as the following are excepted:

Rìgh Seoras a ceithir.		King George the Fourth.
Rìgh Uilliam a h-aon.		King William the First.

RULE X.

When the possessive pronoun a (her) precedes a substantive beginning with a vowel, h- is inserted between them; as,

A h-aire.		Her attention.
A h-oillt.		Her terror.

RULE XI.

When the possessive pronouns ar (our), bhur or ur (your), precede a noun beginning with a vowel, n- is inserted between them; as,

Bhur n-aithrichean.		Your fathers.
---------------------	--	----------------------

RULE XII.

Possessive pronouns are of the same number with their antecedents; as,

Aig a dhorus.		At his door.
Folt a einn.		The hair of her head.

RULE XIII.

If a sentence or a clause be an antecedent, the pronoun is put in the 3d singular masculine; as,

Ged bha mi sgith, eha		Though I was tired, I felt
d' aithnich mi orm e.		it not.

RULE XIV.

The nominative is commonly placed after the verb; as,

Tha iad.		They are.
Theasd iad.		They died.
Ghabh e.		He took.

RULE XV.

The nominative to the verb is often understood with the poets; as,

Ghabh [e] tùinidh.		He dwelt.—Oss. Lod.
Bhuail [e] eraobh Loduinn.		He struck the tree of Lodin.
		—Oss. Lod.

RULE XVI.

Gleidh na fhuair thu.		Keep what you got.

OF GOVERNMENT.

GOVERNMENT is that power which one part of speech has over another, in determining its Form, Mood, Tense, or Case.

THE GOVERNMENT OF SUBSTANTIVES.

RULE I.

One substantive governs another in the genitive when it signifies a different thing; as,

Inneal ciùil.		An instrument of music.
Lòd dhaoine.		A crowd of men.

RULE II.

If a second genitive follows, the former substantive is governed in the nominative; as,

Tìgh fear na bainnse.		The bridegroom's house.
Ainm mac an Rìgh.		The name of the king's son.

RULE III.

When a substantive governs another definitely in the genitive, the article is placed before the latter only; as,

Tìgh an Rìgh.		The king's house.
Solus na greine.		The light of the sun.
Airde nam beann.		The height of the hills.

RULE IV.

A noun governed without the article is commonly in the aspirated form; as,

† There is a form of comparison, already mentioned, among the Gael, which has sometimes the meaning of a substantive, and sometimes of an adjective; as, feairrd, meisd, moid, lughaid, giorraid, teothid. Is feairrd mi so, I am the better for this; a dol am feairrd, growing better, literally, advancing in betterness. The rest are construed after the same manner.

PROSODY.

THE great excellence of any language consists in the power which its sounds possess, of communicating certain impressions or meanings.

The Gaelic, being a branch of the primeval tongue, has this quality in a far superior degree to any language, the structure of which is concocted or complex. It is a language of nature ; and its sounds may be truly said to be echoes to the sense. Hence arises its success in descriptive poetry, and in all its addresses to the passions. When the nature of the object described is harsh and hard, sounds of a similar kind are employed, which impel their meaning to the mind, by noisy, hard-sounding consonants : whereas, in subjects of tenderness, solemnity, or of mournful interest, scarcely is any sound perceived, but the music of mellow vowels and diphthongs.

Mr. Shaw, to whose ill-requited labour the Gaelic owes a great deal, observes correctly, that the combinations ai, ei, are cheerful and soft ; and ao, solemn. He might have added that oi, ao, aoi, are significant of softness and affection, and ui, ua, uai, of sadness. Among the consonants, ll is soft and mild ; so is the gentle aspiration mh, as in caomh, mild ; seimh, quiet ; cr, dr, and tr, are hard, loud, and violent.

VERSIFICATION.

The Gaelic Bards had peculiar facilities in composing ; as they were not restrained by any fixed law of verse. A termination of lines by similar letters was never deemed requisite ; for, if the closing syllable, or the penult of corresponding lines, were somewhat similar in sound, it was reckoned sufficient for the purposes of rhyme, and was all that they usually aimed at.

The following Verses exemplify this Remark.

Thug an deise do Ainnir gaol,
Ach air Goll bha 'gorm-shùil chaoin,
B' e cùis a h-aisling anns an oidhche,
'S cùis a caoidh mu 'n chaochan choillteach.—
Cha b' ionnan is Garna na gruamaich,
Mar lasair 's an tòit ag a cuartach.—Oss. Cathluno.

Another method of rhyme consisted in a conformity of sound between the last word, or part of the last word, of a foregoing verse, and some word, or part of a word, about the middle of the following.

Ciod am fà bhi 'g udal cuain,
Is eilean fuar na geotha crom,
A sgaoileadh a sgiath na 'r coinneamh.
Gu 'r dìon o dhoinionn na h-oidhche.—Ullin.
Mar dha bheum sleibh o 'n fhireach
Le chéile a sreadh gu gleanntai. - Oss.

Sometimes there is a conformity of sound between the last word of a foregoing verse, and a word in the beginning of the following.

Cha do thuit e gun chliù san àraich,
Bu ghàbhaidh le moran 'imcachd;
Mar thorunn ro' choillte, no mar dhealan,
'G a falach an deigh an leir-sgrios.—Ardar.

In some stanzas of four lines, there is sometimes observed a double conformity; that is, in the concluding words of each couplet, and in other words throughout the preceding line of every couplet. This kind of verse possesses great beauty.

Shéid gaoth dhileas air BEANN
'S cha b' FIANN ait buillean 'g a còghnadh;
Sinn a bualadh mhullach nan TONN,
'Sgach SONN is a shùil ri comhraig.—Ullin.

MEASURE.

The poetry of the ancient Gael, as it has come down to us, resembles that of the present day, in its setting every law of scanning at defiance. Ossian, and the poets of his time, adapted their compositions to the song; in other words, they set them to music: and there seem to be but two suppositions on which we can account for the irregularity of their verses. Either the music itself must have been very anomalous, or, the strains having been forgotten, and thus the guides to uniformity lost, the poems must have suffered from the liberties which had been taken with them, by the rehearsers of succeeding ages. I am inclined to think, however, that the music was simple and uniform, and that the poetry was correctly adapted thereto. However irregular the music may be imagined to have been; as the bards must have accurately set their verses to it, there would be observable in their poems a regular recurrence of similar irregularities. This is not the case. The anomaly of their verses must, therefore, be owing to the reciting Bards, who, in some parts, suffered words and turns of expression to fall into oblivion through their indolence; and introduced, in others, expressions which their own conceit informed them were superior to the original; for there never yet was a poet so transcendently good, that a worse did not suppose himself in many respects better.

Add to this, that the language was pronounced differently in different districts, and at different periods of time; yet in these abused fragments of ancient poetry—these remains of Ossian's ruins, we have numberless displays of the might and magnificence of his genius.

Notwithstanding the freedoms which have been taken with the works of the Fingalian poet, they afford numberless examples of correct and measured rhymes; and this circumstance affords a strong presumption that the rhyme, or at least the measure of the poetry, was uniform and regular throughout.

The verses of the Fingalian poets seldom exceed eight syllables; and most frequently the second foot and the third are dactyles, with a short syllable at the beginning of the verse, and a long syllable, or a trochee at the end.

The ancient poems published by Dr. Smith of Campbelton, are still more irregular in their measure than those collected by Macpherson; it being seldom that the same measure applies to four successive lines. They cannot be scanned, therefore, by any set of rules I can devise. In one of these poems, entitled Conn, there is preserved a wild effusion—an incantation of the Scandinavian priests. It consists of five stanzas of four lines each. The last line of each staff has six syllables, consisting of a short syllable, a dactyle, and a trochee; the rest four, consisting of a trochee and a pyrrhic.

Macintyre, our Burns, an uninstructed shepherd, and a man of extraordinary talents for poetry, wrote pieces which may stand comparison with the pastoral and descriptive poetry of any land or age. As the structure of some of them is peculiar, a view of their measure may not here be unacceptable, or misplaced. His best poems are Coire Cheathaich, Beinn Dobhrain, and Mairi Bhàn òg. The first of these is divided into strophes of eight verses each; but they might have been more judiciously arranged in stanzas of four lines. The measure repeats at every second line. There is, moreover, in every first line, a conformity of sound between the first syllable of the second and third foot; and in the second line, between the first syllable of the second, and the middle of the third, foot. This poem may be scanned by an amphybrach and trochee alternately on the first line; the second line is the same, excepting that it terminates with a long syllable.

Beinn Dobhrain is similar in measure to a much older poem, entitled, Moladh Mhòraig. It contains three distinct measures: first, the urlar; secondly, siubhal, quicker than the urlar; and thirdly, crùn-luath, the most rapid of the three. These terms are taken from corresponding strains in piobaireachd. The first stanza, urlar, consists of spondees and dactyles.

I shall conclude this exemplification of Gaelic verse with one of those famous songs of incitement to battle, called, Brosnachadh catha. These songs were not all precisely in the same measure; but they were all quick, rapid, and animating, descriptive of hurried movements, activity, and exertion. The whole song measures like the first staff.

FOCLAIR

GAILIG AGUS BEURLA.

A.

A, a. (aim, the elm.) The first letter of the Gaelic alphabet. It has three sounds: (1.) both long and short. Long, like a in bar, car; as àl, brood, àr, slaughter. Short, like a in fat, cat; as falt, hair, cas, foot. (2.) Both long and short, when immediately preceding dh, and gh; in which state it has no corresponding sound in English. Long, as adhradh, worship; aghmhor, fortunate. Short, as lagh, law; tagh, choose; adharc, horn. (3.) Short and obscure, like e in hinder; as an, am, a, the; ma, nam, nan, if; and the plural terminations a, or an, as laghanna, laws, beanntan, mountains. In the interrogative pronouns an and am, a is scarcely ever pronounced.

A, article. The. Used before words beginning with aspiration; as, a chraobh, the tree; a bheinn, the hill, or mountain.

A, rel. pron. Who, which, whom, what, that. An duine a bhuaill mi, the man whom I struck; mar aisling chaoin a chaidh seach, like a pleasant dream that has passed.—Ull. B'esan a rinn so, it was he who did this.

A, pos. pron. His, her, hers, its. Caireadh gach aon air a léis a lann, let every one gird his sword on his thigh.—Ull. Grad teichidh a geillt 's a brúadar, speedily her terror and her dream shall vanish.—Oss. Taura. Where the succeeding word begins with a vowel, this pronoun is ellipsed; as, thuit e bharr each, he fell from his horse: in speaking of a female, however, the pronoun is used, and, to prevent an hiatus, h, with a hyphen (h-), precedes the noun; as, thuit i bhàrr a h-each, she fell from her horse; but the pronoun is omitted if the preceding word end with a vowel; as, a dùsgadh le h-osnaich, awakening with her sobs.—Oss. Taura. Syr. ha, ah. Heb. a. Chald. eh. Arab. ha. Pers. ou. Gr. òv. Ir. a. Manx. e. Corn. e, i.

A', (for ag), the sign of the present participle. If the participle begin with a vowel, ag, or 'g, is most frequently used, and a', if it begin with a consonant. A gaol 'g a caoidh is ise ag acain, her beloved deploring her, and she wailing bitterly.—Oss. Taura. Le h-osnaich o cadal a dùsgadh, with her own sobs awakening from her sleep.—Id. Ta h-anam ag imeachd gu neoil, her spirit is travelling to its clouds.—Id. It may be said, that in general this particle is used, though with infinitely more elegance and propriety, in the same sense as the English use a, when they say, he is a walking, he is a fishing, tha e ag imeachd, tha e ag iasgachadh.

A, the sign of the infinitive, To.

A, the sign of the vocative. O. (Corn. a.) Caomhain do sholus, a ghrian, spare thy light, O sun.—Oss. Trathal. A Sheallama, teach mo ghaoil! O Selma, thou home of my heart!—Oss. Gaul.

A, (for ann), prep. In, into, within, on. Ciod chuir sin a d'cheann, what put that into your head? A d'chridhe, in your heart.

A, sometimes a sign of the preterite tense. Nuair a thuirte e rium, when he said to me.—Sm.

A, obj. pron. Him, her, it. Cha n'urrainn iad a thogail no'fhagail, they could neither lift nor leave him. Oss. Derm. Theab iad a marbhadh, they had almost killed her.

A, pers. pron. [for e.] Him, he, it. A is never written for e, but, in many districts of the Highlands, e, he or him, is pronounced a; as, Bhuail iad a, they struck him; thainig a, he came.

A, prep. and used before a consonant. Out, out of, from; also in. Na h-carb a foirneart, trust not in oppression. Stew. O. T., a so, from this time. Arm., a so.

A is often used before many adverbs, prepositions, and conjunctions, and some numerals: a bhàrr, besides, a bhos, here, on this side, a choidhch, for ever. A cheana, already; a chéile, each other, a chianamb, a little ago. A cheann, because; a chlisgeadh, in a start, soon. A chum, in order to; a dhà, two; a dhà dheug, twelve. A ghnàth, always; a h-aon, one; a h-aon deug, eleven; a latha 's a dh'oidhche, day and night; a lathair, present. A lethtaobh, aside; a mach, out; a mhain, only; a muigh, without; a nall, hither; a nios, up. A nis, a nise, now; a nuas, down hither; a null, a nunn, thither, across; a réir, according to. A ris, again. A sios, downwards; a suas, upwards.

† A, s. A chariot, car, waggon.—Glossary of Colum Cille.

† A, s. An ascent, hill, promontory.

† AB, negative particle; as ablach, i. e. ab-laoch, a brat.

AB, g. aba, s. f. An ape; a spell, anciently any little creature. Dan. abe. Du. aap. Swed. apa. W. epa. Slav. apinia. Finland. apini, an ape.

† AB, aba, s. m. A father, a lord, an abbot; n. pl. aban, or abannan, abbots. Hcb. ab, or abh. Chald. ab. Turk. aba. Greek, ἀπα. Dor. D. ἀπφος. Lat. abbas. Span. abad. Calmuc Tartars, abagàl. Hung. apa. Grisons, bab. Syracusan and Bithynian, pappas. Syr. abba. W. abad. Arm. and Corn. abatæ, abad. It. papa. Hottentots, bo. Antilles, baba. Herodotus tells us, that the Scythians called father Jove papæus; a modern author says that the Scythian term for father was pappas.

† AB, aba, s. m. Water. Pers. ab, river. Turk. ab. Mogul, ab, river. Heb. saab, carry water; from sa, carry, and ab, water. Ethiop. abbi, wave. Armen. ahp, pool. Pers. ab, ap, av, water. Jap. abi, wash with water.

This word is found in Martin's description of the Hebrides, and in Irvine's nomenclature on the word Avus, which is the name of a lake and river in Argyllshire (Awe); so Ab-us is a name given to the Humber. Wyffleet, in his Supplement to Ptolemy's Geography, calls the place where Columbus first landed in America, Cuanabi, or Guanahani. Both these words have the same signification, meaning a bay, harbour, or sea of water. Cuan is a harbour, and ab is water, and i seems to be an Indian termination. Guanahani; Guan is the same as cuan; g and c, being palatals, are easily changed the one into the other, and an [see an] or han is water: the i, ns in the former instance, is an Indian adjection.

"Seu mari," says Boxhorn, "seu duo fluvii junctis aquis consociantur, locus in quo fit hæc conjunctio Britannicè vocatur aber." The place where a river falls into the sea, or where two rivers join, is, in the old British tongue, called aber. Boxhorn seems to think that aber is a Phœnician word. In some districts of the Highlands, as Breadalbane and Strathay, this word is improperly pronounced obair.

- One may venture to assert that all over the globe, more especially in Europe and Asia, the names of rivers ending in an, aine, ein, in, on, onne, &c. are derived from the old Celtic root, an, signifying an element, water; see an. The Seine is a contraction of seimh-an, the smooth water; and a more descriptive name of that majestic river could not be given. Rhen-us, the Rhine, is reidhan, the placid water; a name which well accords with the general appearance of that river. Garum-us, Garonne, is garbh-an, the rough water. Marne, marblan, the dead water. So also Pad-an-us, the Po; and the Asiatic rivers, Ar-u-on, Jord-an, Gib-on, Jih-on, &c. I have been agreeably surprised to find that in some of these remarks I had been anticipated by a few learned and ingenious etymologists.

 AOIS-DANA, s. pl. (aois, age, and dàn, song.) Bards, poets; rehearsers of ancient poetry; a genealogist; soothsayers.
 The aoisdana were in high esteem throughout the Highlands. So late as the end of the seventeenth century they sat in the srath, or circle, among the nobles and the chiefs of families,

They took precedence of the ollamh, or the doctor in medicine. After the extinction of the Druids, they were brought in to preserve the genealogy of families, and to repeat genealogical traditions at the succession of every chieftain. They had great influence over all the powerful men of their time. Their persons, their houses, their villages, were sacred. Whatever they asked was given them; not always, however, out of respect, but from fear of their satire, which frequently followed a denial of their requests. They lost by degrees, through their own insolence and importunacy, all the respect which their order had so long enjoyed, and consequently all their wonted profits and privileges. Martin thus describes their mode of studying and counting the muse. "They shut their doors and windows for a day's time, and lay on their backs in darkness with a stone upon their belly, and plaids about their heads and eyes, and thus they pumped their brains for rhetorical encomiums."

BARD, baird, s. m. A bard, a poet, a rhymmer. N. pl. baird and barda. W. Barth. Ir. bard. Arm. Barth. Gr. βαρδος.

Lat. bardus. Thigeadh barda le toirm, let poets come with music.—Oss. Tcm. Thaom na baird am fonn, the bards poured forth their strains.—Id.

The Celtic bards were known to the writers of antiquity under the name βαρδοι and bardī. Εισι δε παρ' αυτοις και ποιηται μελων ος βαρδους ονομαζουσιν.—Diod. Siculus. There are also among them versifiers, whom they call bards. Βαρδοι μιν υμνηται και ποιηται.—Strabo, b. iv. They were not only poets, but musicians. Respecting the etymon of this term, Bochart, liv. i. Des Colonies des Phéniciens, chap. 42, observes, that it is of Hebrew origin, being derived from the word parat, to modulate or tune; and this he endeavours to confirm by a quotation from Tacitus de Mor. Germ. "Ituri in prælia canunt; sunt et illis hæc quoque carmina, quorum relatu, quem baritum vocant, accendunt animos," &c. Dr. John Macpherson, who, himself a Celt, might have known better, asserts that it is idle to attempt tracing its etymon, and that, as it is a monosyllable, it cannot be traced to any root. In opposition to these opinions, it may be stated that bard is of Celtic origin; and that it properly means one who extols; being resolvable into b-ard. And, by the way, I may remark, that ard itself, a three-lettered monosyllable, is not a radical word, but is derived from the primeval root, ar, high, which is seen in every language on earth, [see Ard and Bàrr], and, though now gone into disuse among the Gael, is still retained by the Celts of Brétagne in their dialect called the Armoric. That bard is derived from ard, is the more likely, to say the least of it, since the northern word scald, or poet, whose pursuits were similar to the bard's, means also an extoller, being derived from alt, allt, or uld, forms of the same word, which is common to the Celtic and Gothic languages, and signifying high. Bard and scald, therefore, are synonymous terms.

Poetry being, in the opinion of the warlike Celts, the likeliest method of eternizing their bravery, the bards were held by them in the highest veneration. Princes and warriors did not disdain to claim affinity with that order. The Celts, being passionately fond of poetry, would listen to no instruction, whether from priest or philosopher, excepting it was conveyed in rhymes. Hence the word bard meant also a priest, philosopher, or teacher of any kind. Thus we find a bard often entrusted with the education of a prince; and about two centuries ago, a Highland chieftain had seldom any other instructor. Such was the respect paid to the ancient bards, that, according to Diodorus the Sicilian, already quoted, they could put a stop to armies in the heat of battle. After any bloody engagement they raised the song over the deceased, and extolled the heroes who survived.

"Vos quoque qui fortes animas, belloque peremptas
Laudibus in longum vates dimittitis ævum,
Plurima securi fudistis carmina bardī."

When a bard appeared in an army, it was either as a herald or ambassador; hence his person and property were sacred in the midst of his enemies and amid their wildest ravages. In earlier times he never bore arms; and Owen asserts that it was unlawful to unsheathe a weapon in his presence. Among the ancient British there were, according to Jones, three orders of bards: the Privardd, or chief bard, whom the Gael would call Priomb-bhard; the Poswardil, who taught what was set forth by the Privardd; and the Arwyddward, i. e. the ensign bard, or herald-at-arms, who employed himself in genealogy, and in blazoning the arms of princes and nobles, as well as altering them according to their dignity or deserts. Owen observes that their dress was sky-blue, an emblem of peace.

Among the Irish Celts the bards enjoyed many extraordinary privileges. The chief bard was called Fíleadh, or Ollamh ri dàn, a graduate or doctor in poetry, and had thirty inferior bards as attendants, whilst a bard of the second-rate or order had fifteen. The ancient Gael were not behind any of their brother Celts in this absurd veneration. A bard had lands bestowed on him, which became hereditary in his family. A Highland chieftain retained two bards, who, like those of the Irish, had their retinue of disciples; and though the office did by no means procure the same deep respect as in times of old, yet, like every department, secular or otherwise, that permits laziness and procures lucre, it was filled to the uttermost man. Its avarice and its insolence, together with other causes, contributed to the decline of the order. Its indiscriminate satire and ungrateful abuse brought it finally into contempt; and the Gaelic bard of the present day is but a homeless, sarcastic mendicant, who will sing a song of his own composing for a morsel of bread.

Another Gaelic term for bard is aoisdana; which see.

- BEALTAINN, BEALTUINN, s. f. May-day; Whitsuntide; the month of May. La bùidhe bealtuinn, a common name for May-day.
- On the first of May was held a great Druidical festival in honour of the Asiatic god, Belus, whom the Druids worshipped. On this day fires were kindled on the mountain tops for the purposes of sacrifice; and through these fires, according to Keating, the Druids ordered the cattle of the country to be driven, with the design of preserving them from contagion till next May-day. On this day too it was usual to extinguish all the hearth fires, in order that they should be kindled from this purifying flame. Hence it would seem that the right orthography of Bealtuinn is Béil-teine, Belus's fire. La Bealtuinn, therefore, signifies the day of Belus's fire. In some parts of the Highlands, the young folks of a hamlet meet in the moors on the first of May. They cut a table in the green sod, of a round figure, by cutting a trench in the ground of such circumference as to hold the whole company. They then kindle a fire, and dress a repast of eggs and milk in the consistence of a custard. They knead a cake of oatmeal, which is toasted at the embers against a stone. After the custard is eaten up, they divide the cake into so many portions, as similar as possible to one another in size and shape, as there are persons in the company. They daub one of these portions with charcoal until it is perfectly black. They then put all the bits of the cake into a bonnet, and every one, blindfold, draws out a portion. The bonnet-holder is entitled to the last bit. Whoever draws the black bit is the devoted person who is to be sacrificed to Baal, whose favour they mean to implore in rendering the year productive. The devoted person is compelled to leap three times over the flames.—Statistics. Callender.

BREATUNN, tuinn, s. m. Britain.

Of all the attempts that have been made to decompose this word, the most ingenious and the most successful is that of Mr. Clarke, in his Caledonian Bards, mentioned by Dr. MacArthur in his Supplementary Observations on the Authenticity of Ossian's Poems. Bràith-tonn, the top of the wave, is, according to him, the meaning of Breatunn. To perceive the force of this account, one has merely to imagine himself viewing Britain across the Channel from the north coast of France, from whence came our Celtic ancestors. Our island, from that quarter, seems a low dark line, lying along the surface of the deep; and no term could have been found more descriptive of that appearance than Bràith-tonn or Bràith-tuinn, (pronounced Braitonn or Braituinn), the land on the top of the waves? Others will have it that Breatunn is a corruption of Bretuinn, a high island, compounded of the old Celtic term bret, high, and inn, island.

BREITHEANAS, ais, s. m. (from breith.) Ir. breitheamnas. A judgment; a decision; a sudden calamity. La bhreitheanais, the day of judgment; thainig breitheanas ort, a judgment came upon you.

Breitheanas is evidently a contraction of breith a nuas, a judgment from above. It is well known that the sentences passed by the Druids on criminals were often rigorous in the extreme. When they found it expedient to doom a culprit to a severe punishment, or to an awful death, they alleged that they acted by the compulsion of Heaven, which directed all their judgments, and of course approved of all their decisions. Hence their sentence, from the word breith, meaning any ordinary decision, was called breitheanuas, or breitheamhnuas, now contracted breitheanas; meaning a judgment from God, or any rigorous decision. This word is still the term among the Gael to express the decision of a judge, or any sudden calamity.

Carn-cuimhne, a monument; carn-aolaich, a dunghill.*
Cairns or barrows are very numerous in the Highlands of Scotland, in Ireland, and in Wales. They are also to be seen in Sweden, in Norway, and in other parts of the Continent, as also in America. They were intended for monuments; and the probability is, that they were used as such from the earliest ages by every people who could associate their ideas of duration with the properties of stone and rock.
These cairns often measure three hundred feet in circumference at the base, and twenty feet in height. They consist of stone, and the whole pile is shaped like a cone. Several opinions have been formed concerning the intention of them. In several instances they have been explored, and found to contain sepulchral urns; a circumstance which seems to be decisive in favour of the opinion that they are monuments of the dead. Many of these piles consist wholly of earth; and this gave rise to an opinion that the coped heaps of stone were intended for malefactors, and those of earth for the virtuous and the brave. I never could ascertain to what extent this distinction was observed. From ancient authors we learn that malefactors were buried under heaps of stone, and we know that it was a common practice among the Druids to erect cairns on the spot where a criminal had been burnt. Hence fear air charn means an outlaw among the Gael. Tha e air a charn, he is an outlaw. 'Is oil leam nach robh do luath fo charn', I wish your ashes were under a cairn. 'B' fhearr leam bhi fo charn chlach', I would rather be under a cairn, i. e. punished as an outlaw. Though the ceremony of cairn-raising be still prevalent in the Highlands, the meaning of it is changed: for on whatever spot a person is found dead, a few stones are immediately huddled together, and every passenger pays his tribute of a stone; the larger it is, the greater is the respect shewn to the deceased: hence a common saying among the Gael,—'Cuiridh mi clach ad charn, I will add to thy cairn, betokens a friendly intention, and means, I will keep the remembrance of thee alive. The ghost of the deceased is supposed to haunt his cairn; and there are few Highlanders who would pass the spot for the first time without adding to the heap, and thus keeping on good terms with the spectre. At no remote time the compiler of this work used to discharge this debt with devout punctuality, and, if alone and in the dark, would take the best aim in his power, and sling his contribution from a prudent distance.

CAS-CROM, s. f. A little spade, crooked at the lower end, formed in such a way as to turn over the soil in furrows.

This primitive kind of plough is still used in the Hebrides. It is, of course, very unexpedient, eight men being necessary to dig as much in one day as a horse would plough in the same time. Where traces are wanting, the harrow is tied to the horse's tail; but in wet grounds the glebe is broken by means of a heavy-toothed instrument, called ràcan, which men, women, and children, drag along the surface of the ground. The following minute description of the cas-crom is taken from Sinclair's Statistics, Edderrachylis:—"This instrument, chiefly used for tillage, consists of a crooked piece of wood; the lower end somewhat thick, about two feet and a half in length, pretty straight, and armed at the end with iron, made thin and square, to cut the earth. The upper end of this instrument is called the shaft; whereas the lower is termed the head. The shaft above the crook is pretty straight, being six feet long, and tapering upwards to the end, which is slender. Just below the crook or angle, which is an obtuse one, there must be a hole, wherein a strong peg must be fixed for the workman's right foot, in order to push the instrument into the earth; while in the meantime standing on his left foot, and holding the shaft firm with both hands, when he has in this manner driven the head far enough into the earth, with one bend of his body, he raises the clod by the iron-headed part of his instrument, making use of the heel or hind part of the head as a fulcrum; in so doing, he turns it over always towards the left hand, and then proceeds to push for another clod in the same form. To see six or eight men all at work with this instrument, as is often to be seen, standing all upon one leg, and pushing with the other, would be a pretty curious sight to a stranger.

"With all its disadvantages, the cas-crom is, of all instruments, the fittest for turning up the ground in the country; for among so many rocks a plough can do little or nothing; and where no rocks are, the earth is commonly so marshy that cattle are not able to pass over it without sinking deep. Therefore it is of pretty general use in the Highlands, and is of great antiquity. One man can turn over more ground with it in a day than four are able to do with a common spade. For a single man to delve as much ground as will require two pecks of bear-seed in a day is nothing uncommon; nay, some have sown four in a day's work. CLACHAN, ain, s. m. A burying-ground; a parish village; a church; a Druidical place of worship, composed of a circle of stones raised on end; hence the name. Didòmhuich dol do 'n chlachan, on Sunday going to church.—Macfar. Baile chlachain, a name commonly given to a parish village, as it contains a church.

The Druidical circles, or places of worship, so often to be seen throughout Britain, differ considerably in form and in extent; a circumstance which has given rise to the opinion (see Huddleston's Notes to Toland), that some of a particular form were intended for judicial, and others for religious assemblies. These are to be found from twelve feet to twenty yards in diameter; and there is much diversity in regard to the number, magnitude, and arrangement of the stones. Near the more spacious circles, in which the Druids held their larger meetings or general assemblies, there was another lesser circle or square, where the arch-druid, or president, sat. These circles did not always consist of the same number of obelisks; some consisting of seven, some of twelve, some of nineteen; some, as Stonehenge, of 140, and others, as the splendid temple which existed a few years ago at Avebury, Wilts, of 652;—numbers which probably conveyed some emblematical meaning or reference, which cannot now be ascertained. The circle at Avebury enclosed many acres. The obelisks are commonly erect, and are often of vast dimensions; some have measured from fifteen to twenty feet in height, and ten or twelve in circumference.—See Keyser. Antiq. Septent. In the centre there was commonly a stone still larger, which served as an altar; and when a mass of sufficient magnitude could not be found, they substituted an oblong flag, supported by columnar pieces of rock. This altar, the size of which was prodigious, was called cromleac, or clach sleuchd, the stone of bending, or the worship-stone. The very small circles, of twelve feet in diameter, Borlase supposes to have been burial-grounds. Such of those monuments of ancient times as remain among the Gael, are regarded by them with ignorant veneration, amounting almost to terror. They are often commanded to lay hands on them when considered as a deformity to a landlord's grounds; but threats of ejection and imperious remonstrance do not always dispose them to obey. A belief that these circles are haunted by supernatural beings strengthens this feeling of veneration; and thus they, for the most part, abide undisturbed on their site of ages.

Such stones were once frequent in Britain. There is one in the grounds of Balfracks, in Perthshire; another near Pitcaithlie, in the same county. Mention is made of these stones by the writers of antiquity. Pliny says of a rocking-stone which was near Harpasa, a town in Asia: "Cautes horrenda, uno digito mobilis, eadem si toto corpore impellatur, resistens."—PLINY, lib. ii. c. 69. There are also stones in the far-famed isle of Iona, which are called clachan-bràth; they are within the precincts of the burial-ground, and are placed on the pedestals of a cross, and have been, according to Pennant, the supports of a tomb. They derive their name from the belief that the bràth, or world's end, will not come until the stone on which they stand is worn through.

These wandering classes originated when the priesthood was a distinct branch from the bardic system; for the latter then ceased to have sufficient means to support its own members. As a compensation, a law was made, that such as were of this description should have regular periodical circuits, and receive fees according to the quality of those they visited. Ciod so an solus ann Innisfàil o chrann-tàraidh an fhuathais? what light is this from Innisfail from the terrible alarm-fire?—Ull. See also Oss. Carrieth.
 When one Highland chieftain received any provocation or slight from another, or when he had reason to apprehend an invasion of his territories, he straightway formed a cross of light wood, seared its extremities in the fire, and extinguished it in the blood of some animal (commonly a goat) slain for the purpose. He next gave it to some messenger in whose fidelity and expedition he could confide, who immediately ran with it to the nearest hamlet, and delivered it into the hands of the first active brother vassal he met; mentioning merely the name of the place of gathering, which he had previously learned from his chief. This second person, who well understood the purport of the message, proceeded to the next village with the same expedition and with the same words as his precursor. And thus, from place to place, was this instrument conveyed through extensive districts, with a celerity that can scarcely be credited. Degradation or death fell upon all who refused the summons of this mute messenger of bloodshed. In 1745, the crann-tàir, or crois-tàir, traversed the wide district of Breadalbane, upwards of thirty miles, in three hours. The crann-tàir was also in use among the Scandinavian nations.

Observation, however, contradicts this assertion; for in every glen of the Highlands this tree is to be seen. It grows and flourishes where the foot of man never trod—in the inaccessible clefts of lofty rocks; thus presenting an unquestionable appearance of its being an indigenous plant.

The nuts called Molucca nuts, or Molucca beans, are found on the shores of the Western Isles, where the kernels of them are used as a cure for diarrhœa and dysentery. In what way Molucca nuts should be cast ashore among the Hebrides, has been explained in the following manner:—These nuts, or beans, are the seeds of the Dolichos urens Guilandia Bonduc. G. Bonduccetta, and Mimosa Scandens of Linnæus, natives of Jamaica. They grow in vast quantities along the rivers of that island, and are generally supposed to be dropped into the water, and carried into the sea; from thence, by tides and currents, and the predominancy of the east wind, to be forced through the Gulf of Florida into the North American ocean; in the same manner as the Sargasso, a plant growing among rocks in the seas around Jamaica. When arrived in that part of the Atlantic, they fall in with the westerly winds, which blow two-thirds of the year in that tract, and which may help to waft them to the shores of the Hebrides.

Maj. lib. iv. ch. 24.*

This law was old even in the time of William the Conqueror. The cruit was a six-stringed instrument used of old in Scotland and Ireland. It is now confined to the mountains of North Wales. The cruit of the Gael, and the crwdd of the Welch, were the same instrument.

“Romanusque lyra plaudat tibi, Barbarus harpa, Græcus Achilliaca, Crotta Britannia cantet.”
Venantius, lib. 7. Carm. 8.

From these lines, which were written in the sixth century by Venantius Fortunatus, some have imagined the harpa or clarsach, and the crotta or cruit, to have been different kinds of instruments; and yet a Bishop of Lyons, who wrote a century earlier, makes mention of a barbarian Cythara, shaped triangularly like the Greek Δ, not unlike the Irish harp, which seems to favour the opinion that the cruit and the clarsach were but different names for the same instrument. The probability is, that the cruit and the clarsach differed only in this, that the strings of the former were sinews or catgut, and those of the latter were brass wire.

The Rev. Mr. Evans, in describing the Welch crwdd, has the following expressions: “Ex sex chordis felinis constat, nec eodem modo quo violinum modulatur, quamvis à figura haud multum abludat.”

The courmi, which Dioscorides says the old Britons drank, is the same with the cuirm of the Gael and Irish. It was a powerful intoxicating liquor made of barley, and used, of course, at all their banquets; hence cuirm, in Gaelic and Irish, signifies a feast. Some have asserted that this liquor was the same as the modern uisge beatha; but the idea of distillation not being so obvious, nor the process so intelligible, as that of brewing, it is very probable that the liquor was obtained by the latter method.

The curach, or boat of leather and wicker, may appear to the moderns a very unsafe vehicle to trust to in tempestuous seas; yet our forefathers fearlessly committed themselves, in these slight pinnaces, to the mercy of the most violent weather. They were much in use in the Western Isles, even long after the art of building boats of wood was introduced into those parts by the Norwegians. The size of these pinnaces must have been considerable; for Marianus Scotus makes mention of three Irishmen who came in a curach without sails or oars, and landed in Cornwall, after a voyage of seven days. Sidonius Apollinaris, Carm. vii., observes, that the Saxon pirates of his time frequently crossed the British seas in such boats.

A ruder and more ancient vessel was the biolinn or birlinn, compounded of the Celtic bir or bior and linn. Pennant deviates from his usual accuracy when he derives birlinn from the Norwegian byrdinga.

DEIS-IÙIL, s. f. A prosperous course; a turning from east to west in the direction of the sun. Deis-iùil air gach nì, the right course in every thing.—Old Saying.

This is a Druidical term, and is descriptive of the ceremony observed by the Druids, of walking round their temples, by the south, in the course of their divinations; keeping the temple always on the right. This course was deemed prosperous; the contrary (tuath, i. e. tuath-iùil), fatal, or at least unpropitious. From this ancient superstition are derived several customs which are still retained amongst us; such as drinking over the left thumb, as Toland expresses it, or according to the course of the sun.

“Some of the poorer sort of people in the Western Isles,” Martin says, “retain the custom of performing these circles sunways about the persons of their benefactors three times, when they bless them, and wish good success to all their enterprises. Some are very careful, when they set out to sea, that the boat be first rowed about sunways; and if this be neglected, they are afraid their voyage may prove unfortunate. I had this ceremony paid me,” continues the tourist, “when in the isle of Isla, by a poor woman, after I had given her an alms. I desired her to let alone that compliment, for that I did not care for it; but she insisted to make these three ordinary turns, and then prayed that God, and Mac Charraig, the patron saint of that island, might bless and prosper me in all my affairs.”

When a Highlander goes to drink out of a consecrated fountain, he approaches it by going round the place from east to west; and at funerals, the procession observes the same direction in drawing near to the grave. Hence also is derived the old custom of describing, sunways, a circle with a burning brand about houses, cattle, corn, and corn-fields, to prevent their being burnt, or in any way injured by evil spirits, or by witchcraft. This fiery circle was also made around women as soon as possible after parturition, and also around newly-born babes. These circles were in later times described by midwives, and were deemed effectual against the intrusion of the daoine-sìth or sìthichean (fairies), who were particularly on the alert in times of childbed, and not unfrequently carried infants away (according to vulgar legends), and restored them afterwards, but sadly altered in features and in personal appearance.

Infants stolen by fairies, Martin remarks, are said to have voracious appetites, constantly craving food. In this case it was usual for those who believed that their children were taken away, to dig a grave in the fields on quarter day, and there to lay the fairy skeleton till next morning, at which time the parents went to the place, where they doubted not to find their own child instead of the skeleton.

Vid. Little's Dict.* Hence it signifies a brave, lusty, stout man; also a generous man; one different from the plebeian class. Do, prep. (Ir. do.) To, towards, of. When preceding a word beginning with a vowel, do very frequently is aspirated; as, dh' Albainn, to Scotland; dh' Eirin, to Ireland; dh' oidhche is do làth, by night and by day.

Do, pron. Thy, thine. Do bhean, thy wife; d' each, thy horse. (Ir. do. Corn. and W. dy. Arm. da and ta.) Do thigh, thy house; in Armoric it is da tigh.

Do, a prepositive particle of negation, and implies sometimes difficulty, and sometimes impossibility; as, do-thuigsinn, unintelligible, or difficult to be understood; do-àireamb, numberless, or difficult to be counted; do-labhairt, unspeakable.

- DREUG, dreige, s. (druidh-eug.) A meteor; a falling star; a fire-ball.
- Among the ancient Britons, a meteor was supposed to be a vehicle for carrying to paradise the soul of some departed Druid. This superstition, like many others, had its origin in Druidical artifice. The priests of that order, to strengthen their influence, took occasion from every aerial phenomenon to blind and overawe the ignorant; and as they laid claim to extraordinary sanctity, they naturally went to the broad fields of the sky for strengtheners to their illusions. So well did they engraft their absurd opinions, that, even at this distant day, the appearance of a ball of fire creates, among the more ignorant Gael, a belief that some illustrious spirit has taken its flight to eternity. From this circumstance we may infer, with Dr. Smith, that Dreug is a contraction of Druidh-eug, a Druid's death. This ingenious antiquarian thinks, that the Druidical fantasy, just mentioned, must have had its origin in a tradition of Enoch's fiery chariot.

DRUIDH, s. m., from † dru, oak. (Arm. druh. Corn. druw. Ir. drugh.) A Druid; a magician; a conjurer; a Celtic philosopher. N. pl. Druidhean, Druids. Dearg nan Druidhean, Dargo of the Druids, i. e. Dargo the Druid.—Oss. Dargo. Do na druidhean, to the magicians.—Stew. Gen.

Some writers, as Pliny, derive Druidh from the Greek δρυς, an oak; but the proper etymon is the ancient Celtic vocable drū, from which δρυς is taken. The Druids had their name before the Greek language was in existence; and it is well known that the Greek itself was partly taken from the Celtic.

The Druidh was a priest or philosopher among the Celts; but, among the Gael, the word Druidh commonly signifies a magician, one skilled in occult sciences. Dion Chrysostom observes, that the Celtic kings could not so much as design any public measure without the Druids, who were adepts in divination and philosophy; inasmuch that these priests exercised regal authority, and that the kings, who had but the semblance of power, were in truth their servants.

The Druids bore none of the burdens of government. They chose officers for the state and for the army; and, without their consent, even the kings could not declare war. In all respects they affected a distinction from the laity. Their tunics reached to their heels, while those of others only reached the knee. They suffered their beards to grow, whilst others (according to Toland) shaved all theirs but the upper lip. Their hair was cropped, whilst that of others was long. The Druids were entrusted with, or rather, they procured for themselves the trust of, the education of youth. The children of the nobility crowded about them for education; and with them they retired into their solitudes (according to Pomponius Mela), and kept their pupils for twenty years under discipline. That they were learned, is not to be questioned; for they possessed all the learning of their times. They believed and taught the immortality of the soul. Εισαχίου γὰρ παρ' αὐτοῖς ὁ Πυθαγόρου λόγος, ὅτι τὰς ψυχὰς τῶν ἀνθρώπων ἀθάνατους νομο συμβέβηκε.—Diodorus Siculus, lib. v. Immortales autem dicunt hi animos esse.—Strabo, lib. iv. Imprimis hoc voluit persuadere, non interire animas.—Cæsar, lib. iv.

That the British Druids made great progress in astronomy seems evident from Plutarch, de Facie in Orbe Luna, who says that they observed a feast in honour of Saturn every thirtieth year, the time which the planet Saturn takes to complete its course round the sun; and that the feast took place on its entrance into the second sign (Taurus) of the Zodiac. Diodorus the Sicilian, already quoted, makes mention of a certain Hyperborean island (Britain), less than Sicily, opposite to Celtiberia, where the Boreadae (Bards or Druids) could bring the moon near them, so as to see its opacity, its convexity, its mountains, and other phenomena on its surface. Some have, with reason, understood this passage to allude to telescopic observations.

Cæsar, in writing of them in the sixth book of his Commentaries, has “multa præterea de sideribus, atque eorum motu, de mundi ac terrarum magnitudine, de natura rerum . . . disputant;” and Mela writes,—“Hi terræ mundique magnitudinem et formam, motus cœli ac siderum . . . scire profitentur.”

That they were proficient in mechanical philosophy, the obelisks of Stonehenge and of other places are so many standing proofs. Cæsar observes, that the British Druids worshipped a divinity named Taranis or Taran, which in Welch means thunder, as does the Gaelic torunn. In the latter times of the Druidical order, all the principal families in the Hebrides had their Druidh, who foretold future events, and decided all causes, civil and ecclesiastical. The British Druids, according to Dr. Smith, owed their decline to the following circumstance:—Trathal, the grandfather of Fingal, being chosen by them generalissimo (vergobretus) of the Caledonian army sent against the Romans, did not feel disposed, on his return, to resign his authority, even at the command of the Druids. Hence arose a civil war, in which the army of the church was defeated in several battles. These overthrows were fatal to the Druids; they made several attempts to regain their dominion, but all were ineffectual. They retired to I-thonn, the Isle of Waves, or Iona, where, it is said, their order was not quite extinct on the arrival of St. Columbus in the sixth century.

Of the same nature, according to Dr. Smith, was the stratagem of the priests at Delphi, by which Xerxes, and even the bloody Brennus, were driven away with terror, though they approached with the intention of pillaging it.

It is most worthy of remark, that in all languages dun (with, in some instances, the change or addition of a vowel, consonant, or syllable) signifies height, either literally, as in the Celtic, or figuratively, as may be seen from the following words:

Heb. and Chald. dan, a chief magistrate. Heb. din, a height; and adon, a lord. Arab. tun, a height; and doun, don, high, noble. Old Pers. doen, a hill; dun, powerful; and dan, a chief magistrate. Copt. ton, mountain. Syr. doino, a man of authority. Tong. dung, high; and dinh, a summit; and dun, the highest part of a building; and din, a palace. Old Indian, duen, a king. Malay, deun, lord; and dini, high. Luzon, thin, a mountain. Gr. tin, a heap. Phrygian, din, summit. Jap. ton, highest in degree; and tono, a king; and tunde, a superior. Turk. dun, high. Congo. tunene, great. St. Domingo, taino, noble. It. duna, downs, pasturage on a hill. Span. don, lord. It. donna, a lady. Bisc. dun, an eminence, also, an elevated person. Old Sax. dun, a hill; and thun-dcn, elevated. Low. Sax. dun, hill. Van. dun, the highest part. Germ. and Du. dunsen, exalt one's self. Du. duynes. Fr. dunes, heaps of sand on the shore. Fr. dune, downs. Eng. down. Friesland, dunen, to elevate one's self; and dun, a sand-bank. Corn. and Arm. dun and tun. Ir. dhùn. Germ. dun, a city. Eng. town. Scotch, toun. W. dun, mountain.

According to Bede, dun means a height in the ancient British; and according to Clitophon it had the same meaning in the old Gaulish. Δύνον καλοῦσι τὸν ἕψχονσα. They (the Gauls) call an elevated place dun. Hence comes the termination dunum in the names of many towns in Old Gaul; as, Ebrodunum, Ambrun; Vin-dunum, Mans; Noviodunum, Nojon; Augustodunum, Autun; Andomadunum, Langres; Melodunum, Melan; Caesarodunum, Tours; Lugdunum, Lyons, according to Plutarch, Raven-hill;

Carrodunum, Cracow; all situated on rising grounds; hence, also, the British terminations of names of towns, don and ton.

Is it not probable, that in this vocable dun, and not in δυναμις, as O'Brien would have it, we are to find the root of the Gaelic duine, man, as well as of the corresponding terms in the Persic, (see DUINE) Tonquinese, Runic, Irish, Cornish, Armoric, and Welsh languages; signifying, literally, the high being, or the highest of terrestrial creatures?

The original meaning of faoilteach was, perhaps, the wolf month, from the circumstance that wolves, with which the Highlands once abounded, became more daring and dangerous in the depth of winter. Faoilteach may also be derived from faoile, welcome, joy. The Highlanders regard stormy weather, towards the end of January, as prognostic of a fruitful season to follow; and vice versa. Faoilteach may, therefore, mean the welcome season. An old soothing rhyme runs to this effect:—

Faoilteach, faoilteach, lamh an erios,
Faoilte mhòr bu chòr bhi ris;
Croth is caoraich ruithe air theas,
Gul is caoin bu chor bhi ris.
